

Edgar Allan Poe's "The Fall of the House of Usher" is a short story that explores the themes of mental decay and the power of the imagination. The story is set in a grand, old mansion, and the narrator describes the house as a "black and massive" structure that seemed to have a "life of its own." The house is filled with various objects, including a large painting of a "pale, ghastly" figure, and the narrator describes how these objects seem to have a "life of their own" and to be "alive" in a way that is "beyond the reach of human understanding." The story ends with the narrator's death, and the house is left to decay and fall into ruin.
