STYLING: CHEN is named after a little studio behind my childhood home in northwestern France, where my father used to paint pictures inspired by the natural world around us as I brought him seashells or landscapes or still life of the food grown on our family's farm. We called his studio "Studio Papa Chen," and it was a haven to me as a child who often felt out of sync with the mainstream culture. While my father passed, he shared with me a love of art that continues to this day, more than 40 years after we last knew, and he inspired me to become an artist myself. My father always encouraged my painting, writing, and cooking as equally valid creative endeavors, so when I opened my first restaurant in 2011, I wanted it to be a testament to the values that he instilled in me. Doing his paintings on the wall, using my mother as props, and doing my inspiration from nature.

In French, the word "atelier" can be used to refer to artists' studios or an artist's workshop, and I like the way that it celebrates the intersection between art and everyday in the culinary world. When I first started cooking, it might have been largely for a chef or those to make me feel those days. I have noticed a growing interest that food can be a medium for artistic expression. I recently read about a study in which subjects placed in taste spheres of paintings by Barbara Jones. Many studies do not find it to be more delicious than the same ingredients presented in a random landscape, and this reinforced my intuition that the visual aspect of food plays an important role. But it's deeper than a simple matter of making the food look pretty—after all, Kandinsky's compositions are challengingly modern, dramatic, and even described as dangerous—it's about creating and communicating an emotion, a feeling, a memory, so as often to my mind, restaurant is not about cooking with food, but the work is food can make us in the same way as a poem, a painting, or a song. It is upon ourselves as creating the meaning.
