

Italian physicist Alessandro Volta invents a device capable of storing electricity as chemical energy, making it the first true battery. It has three primary parts: a positively charged anode, a negatively charged cathode, and an electrolyte that transports electrons between the two.

1799

French physician Gaston Planté invents the first rechargeable battery. It contains a cathode made of lead dioxide, an anode made of lead, and an electrolyte made of diluted sulphuric acid.

German scientist Carl Gassner creates the first dry cell battery by mixing gypsum plaster and liquid ammonium chloride to create a paste-like electrolyte. This battery design is less susceptible to leakage and can be used in any orientation.

1887

By the mid-20th century, a host of batteries with different chemistries are being manufactured, using lead, nickel, cadmium, zinc, iron, and carbon.

Eveready Battery engineer Lewis Urry invents the first long-lasting alkaline battery. It has an anode of powdered zinc, a cathode of manganese dioxide, and an alkaline substance for its electrolyte. These batteries are rebranded as "Energizer" in 1980.

1958

1970s

Researchers begin experimenting with solid electrolytes. These solid-state batteries are more stable and have a longer lifespan than liquid electrolytes, but they are also expensive and complicated to manufacture.

ExxonMobil chemist Michael S. Whittingham invents a new kind of rechargeable battery with lithium in its anode and electrolyte. It has several advantages over existing options, including a greater energy density, but development is soon discontinued due to cost, complexity, and a tendency for the batteries to catch fire.

1976

American materials scientist John B. Goodenough develops a battery with a cathode made of lithium cobalt oxide. This increases the battery's voltage and gives birth to the lithium-ion battery.

Sony begins selling camcorders containing the first commercial lithium-ion batteries. Thanks to researcher Akira Yoshino, they have carbon-based anodes that make them safer than previous versions of the tech. Yoshino, Goodenough, and Whittingham will later earn a Nobel Prize in Chemistry for their work on lithium-ion batteries.

Lithium-ion dominates a booming global market for batteries, storing energy for consumer tech, electric vehicles, power utilities, and more, but challenges with safety, material sourcing, and soaring demand have the world looking for alternatives.
