The Directorate of Special Operations (DSO) was set up in 1999 as a specialised unit of the National Prosecuting Authority with the dual responsibility of investigating and prosecuting national priority crimes, the main focus being high-level corruption and organised crime. Despite its successes, by 2005 critics were raising questions about its mandate and the strained relationship between the DSO and the South African Police Service (SAPS). Consequently, President Mbeki appointed Judge Sisi Khampepe to head a Commission of Inquiry into the mandate and location of the DSO. This article is a summary of some of the key issues raised in the Khampepe Report.

The Directorate of Special Operations (DSO) was established in 1999 with the specific responsibility to investigate and prosecute cases of organised crime and corruption. The DSO, also known as the Scorpions, was located in the National Prosecuting Authority (NPA) to allow for prosecutor-led investigations. In 2005 the legality of the Scorpions' mandate was called into question and problems were raised about the apparently strained relationship between the DSO and the South African Police Service (SAPS). To avoid further political and legal rows concerning the DSO, President Mbeki appointed Judge Sisi Khampepe on 1 April 2005 to head a Commission of Inquiry to 'inquire into, make findings, report on and make recommendations' regarding the mandate and location of the DSO.

In June 2006 President Mbeki and his Cabinet adopted the recommendations of the Khampepe Commission, but the report was only made public almost two years later, in May 2008, soon after Cabinet had endorsed draft laws to dissolve the Scorpions and have them integrated into the SAPS. These Bills reflected the ANC's decision to dismantle the Scorpions, as was agreed by the party at its 2007 Polokwane Conference.

The concerns of the Commission

The Khampepe Commission of Inquiry was established to respond to concerns and questions relating to the role and functioning of the DSO that had been raised by the public, components of the
