

Arctic Wolves

Also known as white wolves or polar wolves, Arctic wolves are mammals that live in the extreme environment of the Arctic Circle. They can be seen in Greenland, Alaska and northern Canada.

Appearance

Arctic wolves have a double layer of fur to keep in body heat and protect their skin from moisture. Their fur grows thicker as the winter months approach and is white to help them camouflage in the snowy landscape.

Diet

Arctic wolves are carnivores. They eat other mammals, including Arctic foxes and hares, as well as birds. Occupying a large territory, they hunt in a pack to bring down larger animals, such as reindeer and musk oxen. A hunt could last for several days. They are apex predators, which means that they are not hunted by other animals.

Habitat

Arctic wolves are social and live in family groups. As the ground where they live is frozen, Arctic wolves are unable to dig a den. They find natural shelters in the landscape instead, including in caves and among large rocks. They are not under threat of habitat destruction or hunting by humans, due to the remoteness of the areas where they live.

Adaptations

Arctic wolves have thick, cushioned paws to help them grip on the icy terrain. They have a narrower head, smaller ears and a shorter nose than gray wolves to prevent heat loss. Underneath their skin is a thick layer of body fat. As well as keeping them warm, this enables them to survive several weeks without food if necessary.

Communicating with

Arctic wolves communicate with each other by howling and through body language.

They have an amazing sense of smell to seek out their prey even when they can't see it.
