

and decays over time. The rate of decay is known, so scientists can use it to calculate the age of something that contains carbon-14. For example, if a scientist found a sample of wood that contained carbon-14, they could use the rate of decay to calculate how long ago the tree died. Isotopes of an element will have identical chemical reactions. Hence when a radiolabelled compound is administered, these molecules are metabolized by the body similar to normal molecules. This is called Tracer technique. Almost all biochemical research will utilise such tracer methods. A few examples are given below.

- i. Almost all the pathways described in earlier chapters were studied by using tracers. For example, ^{14}C -labelled acetic acid is shown to be incorporated into palmitic acid. Suppose labelled "A" is administered to an animal. After a few minutes, liver contains labelled "B" and after one hour, labelled "C" is seen in liver. Thus, we can say that the pathway is A to B to C.
- ii. The turnover rate of a substance in the body, that is, the rate of synthesis and breakdown could also be studied by tracer techniques. For example, if ^{125}I -labelled immunoglobulin is injected, the quantity of the labelled molecules in the circulation will be proportional to the catabolism of the Ig. By such methods, it is shown that the half-life of IgG is 15 days, of albumin is about 21 days.
- iii. ^{32}P is useful to trace the nucleic acid synthesis in vivo and in vitro. It is therefore employed in genetic research. ^3H -labelled thymidine is incorporated in the newly synthesized DNA and therefore used in assessing cell division kinetics. $^3\text{H}\text{C}$ is taken up by living cells and the label is liberated when the cell is lysed. Therefore, it is used in vitro to quantitate the cell lysis by immunological or pathological mechanisms.

- iv. The total body content of a particular substance (also designated as the "pool" of the substance) can be quantitated by the isotope dilution technique. To cite an example, 1 ml of ^{131}I -labelled albumin is seen to have 1 million dps. This is injected intravenously to a man. The radioactivity will be uniformly mixed in the total blood volume. After 10-15 minutes, a blood sample is withdrawn. One ml of blood is shown to have a radioactivity with 200 dps. The volume injected and removed is the same 1 ml, but the original count is now diluted 5,000 times. Thus, the intravascular space is 5,000 times more than the volume injected. Therefore, the blood volume is 5,000 ml.
- v. Similarly extracellular volume (intravascular + interstitial spaces) is determined by ^{24}Na -labelled NaCl and the total body water by means of ^3H -labelled water. From such experiments it is shown that intracellular compartment is 40%, interstitial compartment is 10% and intravascular volume is 4% of the total body weight.

BIOLOGICAL EFFECTS OF RADIATION:-

1. Direct Effects on Cancer Tissues The radiation damages DNA molecules. No effects are visible immediately. But the damage is observed during the next mitosis. Since new DNA cannot be synthesized, cells die at the attempt of the next division. Chromosome breakage is often noticed. Radiation produces large quantities of free radicals in tissues. The catastrophic effects of free radicals on different biological compounds (including DNA) are described in Chapter 20.
2. Indirect Effects on Cancer Tissues Damage to local blood supply cuts off the nutrition and causes local necrosis and cell death.
3. Effects of Radiation on Normal Tissues In 1904, Madame Curie went for a lecture-
