

Module 1.3 Storage, memory and processing

Written module activity

1. When someone asks you how much memory your computer has, are they referring to primary or to secondary storage?
1. Primary storage
2. What are DIMMs?
2. RAM comes in 'sticks' called DIMMs (Dual InLine Memory Modules) that plug into the motherboard.
3. Your father wrote down the following hardware specifications of a computer:

Intel® i7 Processor 2.3 GHz
Windows 10 Home
1 TB RAM
4096 MB Hard drive

- (a) How many gigabytes (GB) does 4096 MB represent?
 - (a) Approximately 4 GB as $1 \text{ GB} = 1024$ (approximately 1000) MB
 - (b) Which specifications are obviously incorrect? Briefly motivate your answer.
 - (b) The hard drive and memory (RAM) specifications are probably swapped around by mistake, as memory is usually measured in the low Gigabytes range (anything from 1 – 64 GB). Storage is measured in the mid-range (500 GB +) range of Gigabytes or low Terabytes (TB).
 - (c) Why does one need so much less memory than storage? Motivate your answer by referring to the different role that each of these performs in the functioning of a computer.
 - (c) Only programs and data that you want to work with are loaded into memory. Storage is where a permanent record of our programs and data is kept (even when the computer is switched off), so it has to be far bigger than memory.
4. Why do changes you are busy making to a Word document get lost if the power goes off, but the actual program never gets affected? Surely the program and the document both need to be loaded into memory for you to work on the document?
 4. Yes, both need to be loaded into memory, but no changes are made to the program, as opposed to the document. So, when the power goes off, the original program is still (unchanged) on the disk, but the changes in the document that were not saved to disk are 'lost'. Memory is volatile – it only keeps its contents whilst it is supplied with power.
