Catalina and her father, who she calls Papá, live near the Cerro Tololo observatory located on the top of two mountains near La Serena, Chile. The observatory is home to a group of very large and powerful telescopes. Because the instruments on the telescopes are so delicate, the telescopes are kept in dome structures for protection.

Lace Round the Sky

by Cecilia Aragon

Adapted from "Lace Round the Sky" by Cecilia Aragon, all by road images (Orion), September 2014.

- 1 Catalina stood on the doorstep of the Cerro Tololo observatory staff housing, drinking in deep lungfuls of the clear night air under the blazing Southern Hemisphere starshine. The Milky Way sprawled across the sky, a swath of pure white lace shadowed by dark blotches.
- 2 Night was her favorite time. During the day the Chilean mountaintop swarmed with tourists, shouting and calling to each other as breezes spun dust into the thin mountain air. While the visitors were there, Papá could not allow her to help.
- 3 But at night, when everything was quiet, Catalina was one of the few who were allowed beyond the roped-off corridors and the "No Admittance" signs. The night staff all knew her.
- 4 She loved helping to service the grand telescopes, the eyes that peered out into the universe—even if it was annoying how she was always told not to disturb the astronomers who directed the telescopes through the night. Catalina wanted more than anything to confess her secret dream to these great and revered scientists.
- 5 When she said, "Papá, I want to be an astronomer someday," he laughed and tugged at one of her long black braids.
- 6 But Catalina was curious. The sky did not merely consist of white dots of stars against a black background. The sky she saw every night was knotted with patterns, from fuzzy balls of fluff to filaments.
