Following extensive international treatment discussions, which included with the European Union, in 2001, South Africa signed a Memorandum of Understanding with the African Union, which was signed in October 2002 in Pretoria. These events, together with the fact that the international community had not taken concrete steps to pressure South Africa, led to the decision to accept the offer of the United Nations Security Council. The Security Council, in turn, decided to refer the South African case to the International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague. The ICC was established in 2002, and its mandate is to prosecute and prevent genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity. The ICC has since been instrumental in the prosecution of South African leaders, including President Jacob Zuma, who was charged with crimes against humanity in 2018. The ICC's role in South Africa's transition to democracy is a subject of ongoing debate, with some arguing that it has helped to bring justice to victims and others arguing that it has undermined the country's efforts to build a new, more inclusive society.
