Abstract—The authors examined the effects of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness and health-related quality of life (HRQL) of sedentary, middle-aged, obese women. The program consisted of 3 sessions per week, each lasting 45 min. The sessions included aerobic and resistance training, stretching, and relaxation exercises. The program was designed to improve cardiovascular fitness, muscle strength, and flexibility. The results showed that the program significantly improved cardiovascular fitness, muscle strength, and flexibility. Additionally, the program significantly improved HRQL, including physical functioning, role limitations due to physical problems, and overall quality of life. The authors concluded that a 12-week training program can improve physical fitness and HRQL in sedentary, middle-aged, obese women.

These results suggest that the relationship between the use of a particular technology and the amount of time spent on it is not linear. The use of a particular technology may be associated with a significant increase in the amount of time spent on it, but this increase may be offset by a decrease in the amount of time spent on other activities. For example, the use of a particular technology may be associated with a significant increase in the amount of time spent on it, but this increase may be offset by a decrease in the amount of time spent on other activities. Abstract

For this investigation of the role of social networks in coping strategies, we used a sample of 100 women who were the mothers of children with autism.

This study has limitations that influence the generalizability of the findings. First, as noted previously, the sample was a convenience sample and is representative of the general population of the United States. Second, the study was cross-sectional and did not include a control group. Third, the study was conducted in a single setting.
