

Chapter 4

Probabilistic Risk Assessment

Martin E. Hellman

Probabilistic risk assessment (PRA) can provide a quantitative estimate of risk for catastrophes that have not yet occurred by analyzing sequences of events that can lead to that event—in our case a major nuclear war. PRA is also useful for reducing that risk by identifying potential paths to nuclear weapons use that otherwise might escape attention. While PRA has been embraced in nuclear power, spaceflight, and other engineering fields, there are significant challenges to transferring that experience to the risk of nuclear deterrence failing. In-depth PRA of nuclear deterrence holds promise but requires significant further research. Fortunately, a simple approach can be used to show that the risk of nuclear deterrence failing currently appears to be on the order of 1 percent per year. It is hoped that this surprising result will cause society to invest in the larger efforts required for in-depth analysis, both to estimate and to reduce the risk of a major nuclear war.

The debate over our nation's nuclear posture has been carried out largely in a fashion inconsistent with the issue's importance. On the one hand, former secretary of defense James Schlesinger stated that we will need to depend on nuclear deterrence "more or less in perpetuity," while former secretary of defense Robert McNamara claimed that doing so "will destroy nations."

This chapter addresses the role that probabilistic risk analysis, or PRA, can play in the nuclear posture debate.

Can Probabilistic Risk Analysis Be Applied to Nuclear Deterrence?

By fostering a culture of risk awareness, PRA (also known as quantitative risk analysis, or QRA) has improved safety and illuminated previously unforeseen failure mechanisms in areas as diverse as nuclear power
